Liberal theorists in the s took up this idea and challenged state-centric Realist thinking by arguing that the main reference of security policy and the focus of international politics in general should be society. The Growing Dimensions of Security. An active intention to establish such an information flow had to be present, but we cannot speak of a medium to form public technical communication, knowledge or understanding.

As far as we can see, historians have only partially addressed this challenge. Were there any debates on human security in both time phases and if yes, which problems were discussed; which larger social developments were mirrored in these debates; what were the implications of potential threats posed by juvenile delinquency for life in urban settings? Security and Conflict in the New Environmental Politics.

The consequence of the extension of the issue dimension of security is a definite political problem:
